This study aims to determine 1) how nuns make sense of learning, 2) the reasons of nuns' willingness to carry out the mission of study, 3) the difficulties encountered by nuns in undergoing task mission study in university, and 4) the efforts that nuns make in overcoming those difficulties.

The research is a qualitative research in the form of a case study. The research took place at one of the study programs in a private university in Yogyakarta. The data source of this research was two nuns carrying out task mission study in university. The data collection techniques implemented were observation, interview, and FGD. The qualitative data analysis techniques implemented were creating verbatim, creating verbatim coding, categorizing themes, filtering data, and interpreting the data.

The research results showed that the meaning of task mission study to nuns is a process that is encountered and dealt with every day, along with all the difficulties and challenges in learning. Nuns make sense of learning by studying hard and diligently, cultivating themselves, and expanding their knowledge and insight. The nuns study because of the government's regulations that govern manpower qualifications, the congregation's needs, and self-awareness. The difficulties that they face are the lack of ability of using computer, lack of information, difficulties in adapting to the social environment, as well as academic ability due to differences in age and curriculum, difficulties in listening rather than speaking, sleepiness, and lack of discipline. The nuns try to overcome those difficulties by praying, sharing their stories and believing that people are willing to help, being aware as religious people and congregation members who live under vows and rules, establishing relationships and communication in the social environment, prioritizing community life, living the spiritual life rather than studying, following all community activities, avoiding student organization activities, being humble and inquisitive, stretching and washing face when feeling drowsy, having the courage to try things out and to make mistakes, being patient and diligent in doing assignments, being wise in facing challenges, and realizing that there are challenges in every struggle.
