ABSTRACT

Cyberbullying on social media often involves teenagers as victims. Victims of cyberbullying who experience stress are interesting to study. This study used qualitative method. The aim of using the qualitative method was to understand the kind of coping stress dynamic used by the cyberbullying victims. This study used qualitative analysis research, particularly deductive analysis. The study was conducted on three teenagers who were victims of cyberbullying while studying in junior high and high school. The data collection was done by semi structured interview. The results showed that the dynamics of coping with stress were different from each participant. This variation cannot be separated from the perceived stress and the situation encountered when experiencing stress. There was originally a stress coping focused on emotions then turned into a problem-focused stress coping, or vice versa. The conclusion of this study is that victims of cyberbullying perform dynamic coping such as: seeking of instrumental social support, turning to religion, positive reinterpretation, and suppression of competing activities.
